The proposed rule is too long and vague. I have been reading through the documents and found maybe three paragraphs of the actual rule. The writers of the proposed rule seem to be confused about what science is. They also seem to be confused about the difference between public opinion and popularity.

As for particular planning processes, they should include everyone who is effected by any changes. If changes to a particular National Forest's plan benefit an individual company, everyone impacted by that company should be consulted. If Vail gets to use our National Forest's in a way that other companies do not, (something that has happened in the past), then the Forest Service needs to consult with all the communities effected by that decision which includes places as far away as Los Angeles.

So having the person who runs the meetings be the one who makes the decisions is probably a good idea, but that person needs to understand the full range of people who are impacted by any decisions.
